Master in Human Geography: Globalization, Society and Territory 2019/2020

The Master in Human Geography: Globalization, Society and Territory benefits from IGOT's vast training experience in postgraduate courses in the scientific field of Human Geography and the excellence of the Institution and its R&D unit – the Centre for Geographical Studies (CEG). It is a scientifically innovative Master's Degree, which analyses and discusses the contemporary challenges of global change and meets the most advanced disciplinary perspectives, while also focusing on the applied and professional components of training.

Adopting an eminently critical tendency in the approach to spatial processes, the course adds to the association of Social Geography and Political Geography (in articulation with the economic dimension), the view of Cultural Geography, making the analysis of problems more comprehensive and providing answers. By reinforcing training in methods (qualitative, quantitative and cartographic) and introducing the possibility of accomplishment of curricular internships as an alternative to theses, it reinforces the students' practical skills and supports their experimentation in a working environment. It aims at responding to a demand from students from various disciplines, interested in obtaining specific expertise in an advanced training level, with a strong theoretical, methodological and critical reflection component, focusing on the following areas:

- The present-day spatial organization dynamics in a globalization framework and the global-local relations;
- The processes and manifestations of spatial injustice and segregation in urban environment;
- The changes in the economy and the environment and their territorial repercussions at various scales;
- The conflicts associated to changes in geopolitics and to competition processes for different resources;

- The trends of mobility and migration of the population and the construction of diverse cultural territories;
